A benefit for only the best employees

The most valuable team members on a company's roster are always looking for ways to up their contribution to its success. That's why they are the ones most likely to join or remain with a company that provides a Section 127 Educational Assistance Program (EAP) for employees.

How it works

An EAP is a straight-forward employee benefit that pays tuition and related expenses for employees. Other than the requirement of the employer to have a written plan in place, all of the rules are left up to the employer.

Amount

The maximum benefit amount an employee can receive tax-free is $5,250 per year.

At the employer's option, an annual limit can be set lower or higher than the allowable tax-free amount. When set higher, the amount over $5,250 will be taxable to the employee.

Eligibility

Each plan sets its own eligibility rules by creating eligible and ineligible employee groups. Popular groups are full-time, part-time, or employees completing a year's employment.

An EAP may not be set up in a way that discriminates in favor of highly-compensated employees.

Covered expenses

The plan can pay for tuition, books, fees, and equipment necessary to complete the course of study.

However, anything an employee keeps after the course is finished may not be reimbursed. (books, equipment, etc.).

To keep it simple, an employer may limit payments to tuition and fees; or, for the most help to these employees, the plan can cover all eligible expenses while making provision for items that might be retained or sold at a loss by the employee.

Many employers also set a rule that the plan will only reimburse employees for courses completed with a certain grade or higher.

Course of study

Generally, EAPs can pay for courses on any topic that is not a sport, hobby, or game.

Each plan can make other requirements, such as the course being relevant to the employee's current job or, more generally, in a field that holds value to the company in any future position the employee may attain.

Separation repayment rules

An employer may require that an employee repay any EAP funds received within a certain period of time before he or she voluntarily separates from the employer.

The most common period for a separation repayment rule is one year, and some employers pro-rate the amount quarterly.

FAQs

The Core 127 Educational Assistance Program plan document package includes everything an employer needs to establish an EAP, and it all comes to you for a one-time fee of $99.

Here are some common questions employers ask before ordering:

How many employees are required for a company to have an EAP?

There is no minimum number of employees necessary for an employer to provide an EAP. A company with as few as one can offer a plan as a way to enhance the value of its benefits package.

This includes corporations, LLCs, partnerships and sole proprietorships.

However, owners and more than 5% stockholders may not receive EAP benefits.

Can an employee receiving other student aid also receive EAP payments from an employer?

Employees receiving other financial aid that does not have to be repaid (grants and scholarships, for example) may not receive EAP assistance to cover the same expenses paid by that student aid.

Employees using student loans to help fund their education may receive EAP funds to pay or repay those expenses.

Can an EAP make advance payments to employees?

Yes. While it is more common for a company to set up an EAP to only reimburse employees upon successful completion of a course, some employers provide an advance to employees in need of it.

Does a new EAP have to start on January 1?

No. The first year can start any time with a short plan year.

If you want to start a calendar year plan on July 1, the first plan year is "short," beginning July 1-and ending December 31. All other plan years will be January 1-December 31.

This technique is available for non-calendar plan years, too.

Do I need a separate account to fund an EAP?

No. The account does not have to be funded in advance or apart from the employer's general fund.
